Student Apathy The Protection Of Self Worth What Research Says To The Teacher:

Student Apathy James P. Raffini, 1988 Some educational practices have contributed to the apathy of students These include a perceptual view of behavior the view that self worth equals achievement norm referenced evaluation and success as ability and effort Four strategies which have the potential for allowing students to experience success from reasonable levels of effort include 1 individual goal setting structures that allow students to define their own criteria for success 2 outcome based instruction and evaluation which make it possible for slower students to experience success without having to compete with faster students 3 attribution retraining which can help apathetic students view failure as a lack of effort rather than a lack of ability and 4 cooperative learning activities which help students realize that personal effort can contribute to group as well as individual goals Educators must confront the discrepancies between the actual and stated goals of education Students have the power to choose how much effort to expend on any task If the goal is to differentiate students according to their ability then slower students will choose to reject school by avoiding effort For those students who are forced to choose between rejecting schooling or rejecting their sense of self worth time is short ABL Resources in Education ,1997
