

Structuralism in Literary Theory

- Structuralism is used in literary theory, for example, "...if you examine the structure of a large number of short stories to discover the underlying principles that govern their composition...principles of narrative progression...or of characterization...you are also engaged in structuralist activity if you describe the structure of a single literary work to discover how its composition demonstrates the underlying principles of a given structural system" (Tyson 197-198).
- Northrop Frye, however, takes a different approach to structuralism by exploring ways in which genres of Western literature fall into his four mythoi (also see Jungian criticism in the Freudian Literary Criticism resource):
- theory of modes, or historical criticism (tragic, comic, and thematic);
- theory of symbols, or ethical criticism (literal/descriptive, formal, mythical, and anagogic);
- theory of myths, or archetypal criticism (comedy, romance, tragedy, irony/satire);
- theory of genres, or rhetorical criticism (epos, prose, drama, lyric) (Tyson 240).
