

Cell Bio – Chapter 3

Protein Structure and Function

- Levels of protein hierarchy
 - Primary structure – sequence of amino acids
 - Secondary structure – alpha helix, beta pleated sheet – initial folding pattern
 - Based on the types of R groups, polypeptides will tend to form helices, beta-pleated sheets, or “unordered” structures
 - Fold into higher order, 3D structures in particular ways
 - Tertiary structure – whole molecule folding
 - Quaternary structure – molecule interactions
 - In addition to having particular amino acids to generate particular 3D structures, some proteins have structural motifs that have been reused through evolution to perform particular functions
 - Coiled-coil motif
 - EFhand/helix-loop-helix motif
 - Zinc-finger motif
- Most proteins interact with other proteins and cellular structures to form higher order structures that enable them to perform sophisticated biological functions
 - Ribosomes
 - Mediated complexes involved in gene transcription
 - RNA polymerase, general transcription factors, and mediator complex all interact with a promoter to form the transcription preinitiation complex
 - In addition to “intrinsic” structural features of the proteins (and the partners to which they bind), there are extensive post-translational modifications (such as phosphorylation/dephosphorylation) that are important in governing the formation of these higher order structures
- Advantages of assembly of proteins into multi-protein complexes?
 - Localization
 - Efficiency
 - Specificity
 - Regulation
 -  Individual, separate reactions vs. coupled reactions where the products immediately become reactants in a new reaction
 - Multi-enzyme complex
 - Multifunctional proteins
 - Similar principles apply to association with membranes, which can also control vectoral movement of substrates and products, and for processes such as ion pumps
 - There are also cases where the structure of the protein is adapted to enhance the interactions
 - Antibodies
 - Disulfide bonds
 - Evolved the ability to create a structure to identify MANY antibodies
