

The interrater reliability of a Dutch version of the Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-III-R Personality Disorders

Arntz A, van Beijsterveldt B, Hoekstra R, Hofman A, Eusenco M, Sallaerts S. The interrater reliability of a Dutch version of the Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-III-R Personality Disorders. Acta Psychiatr Scand 1992; 85: 394-400.

This study presents data on the interrater reliability of a Dutch version of the Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-III-R Personality Disorders (SCID-II). Seventy outpatients were interviewed before the start of their treatment by one rater, while a second rater observed. Both raters were instructed to make independent ratings and the second rater was not allowed to participate in the discussion. On criterion level, interrater reliabilities appear to be very good, with a few exceptions (most reliabilities are higher than 0.75). However, all 5 observation criteria had poor interrater reliabilities. Agreement on personality disorder, on the whole, was excellent (overall kappa = 0.89). The possible reasons why relatively lower reliabilities are found with some criteria are discussed. Finally, problems encountered during the interviews are addressed and possible adjustments of the SCID-II are suggested.

Research on the clinical diagnosis of personality disorders has shown that agreement is generally poor (1-3). Therefore, several instruments have been developed to increase the reliability of the diagnosis of personality disorders (4). One of the most promising ways to increase reliability is the use of (semi)structured interviews. Somewhat disappointing interrater reliabilities have been reported for a structured interview, the Structured Interview for DSM-III Personality Disorders (5): of the 11 disorders assessed, 7 had median item interrater reliabilities below 0.60; and the interrater agreement on the presence of a specific personality disorder was also found to be low (except for dependent and borderline disorders). Higher interrater reliabilities have been reported for various semistructured interviews (6-9). In particular, the Personality Disorder Examination (PDE) (6), for which the interrater reliabilities of the sum scores of each disorder ranged from 0.84 to 0.99 and kappas for the personality disorder diagnoses ranged from 0.70 to 0.96, and the Diagnostic Interview for Personality Disorders (DIPD) (9), for which kappas > 0.86, except for the paranoid personality disorder ($\kappa = 0.52$), seem to be reliable instruments. Unfortunately, no figures on the interrater reliabilities of the separate criteria as assessed by these interviews have been reported.

A promising (4) instrument is the Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-III-R Personality Disorders

(SCID-II) (10). This interview is constructed on the basis of the criteria of DSM-III-R. It is semistructured, uses standard questions for each criterion and allows the clinician to ask further questions and discuss the evidence with the patient. The interviewer has to give his or her own clinical judgment about the presence or absence of the criteria, and is not restricted to using merely the content of the subject's answers. As in DSM-III-R, the interviewer must have clear evidence for the presence of a criterion as a stable characteristic of the patient, not restricted to periods with Axis I disorders or to specific situations, to make a positive rating.

To the present authors' knowledge, only 1 study has yet reported on the interrater reliability of the SCID-II (11). In a sample of 32 agoraphobic patients, 4 personality disorders were diagnosed often enough to estimate interrater reliabilities: avoidant ($\kappa = 0.81$); obsessive-compulsive ($\kappa = 0.71$); paranoid ($\kappa = 0.61$); and borderline ($\kappa = 0.63$) personality disorder. The interrater reliability for the diagnosis of any personality disorder was 0.75. Unfortunately, the sample size of the study and the prevalence rates of most personality disorders were rather low in this study. In a larger sample, kappa can be estimated more reliably, and more personality disorders can be diagnosed. Nevertheless, the findings are promising. Even less is known about the validity of the SCID-II. Poor concurrent validity between the SCID-II and
