Objectives for the Profession

WHILE it may be better to travel hopefully than to arrive, it is as well to know in what direction one is travelling and toward what objectives. The Royal College of Nursing booklet Observations and Objectives, announced last week, sets out against the social background of the time and the advances in medical knowledge a number of objectives for the profession.

Considering first the problem of staff shortages in the National Health Service and particularly in the mental hospitals, the memorandum emphasizes the need for team nursing—that is, the qualified nurse as the leader, but one actively participating with her team of students, assistants and auxiliaries in the care of the patients. Enrolled assistant nurses should provide a large proportion of the basic care under the direction of the State-registered nurse, and the number of hospitals approved as training schools for assistant nurses should be increased, while the number of nursing schools approved by the General Nursing Councils for the preparation of students for the State Registers should be reduced. The two types of training, each with minimum standards for admission and an educational programme of training, should increase the numbers of staff, and by good selection reduce the wastage due to candidates failing to complete a training unsuited to their particular capacities. To assist the serious shortage of staff in mental hospitals the memorandum recommends that a grade equivalent to that of the assistant nurse in general hospitals should be employed in mental hospitals.

With increased numbers of staff obtained through the two types of training, by means of which every young man and woman who has the desire to nurse can take the one most suited to them, the College calls for careful selection of student nurse candidates in place of the indiscriminate recruitment by many hospitals today with resultant high wastage rates. Further, while recognizing that the student nurse gains essential practical experience by giving service in the hospital wards, it is vitally important not to subordinate training requirements to staffing needs. A training agreement should make clear the obligation of the school of nursing to the student, as well as the student's obligation to the school. The value of further educational courses for qualified nurses is also emphasized and hospital authorities are urged to release their staff to attend further courses.

The Royal College of Nursing does not suggest that all nurses, or even the majority, should have a university preparation, but seeks the establishment of a university degree course which would combine the essential training for State-registration with the academic discipline and broad outlook offered by university life and study. This would attract to the profession those who at present find the training intellectually unsatisfying.

Conditions of service and salaries for nurses are considered in the College memorandum and the existing pattern of salary structure is considered unsatisfactory. Instead of the present system where, for example, the salary of a matron is based solely on the number of beds in the hospital, it is proposed that nurses' salaries should be related to three factors: qualification, function and responsibility. They should also stand comparison with those of workers in other professions.

Hours of duty and regular off duty, known well in advance, are matters which could already be satisfactorily arranged in each hospital, but three months' special leave after seven years' continuous service is proposed for ward sisters and senior grades, while leave with pay for attendance at professional conferences is also sought.

Now that the nursing profession is recognized as having a national and international contribution to make it is the more important that there should be opportunities for nurses to prepare themselves to serve on committees, boards of management, on national advisory councils and in the Ministries. While no nurse in this country is yet a Member of Parliament, the profession is expected to contribute to the preparation of Parliamentary Bills and regulations relating not only to nurses and nursing, but on health and social legislation. Administration, formulation of policy and planning of all kinds, are spheres in which nurses may well expect to play an even greater part in the near future.

Without research the work of a profession must be incomplete. The Council of the Royal College of Nursing,
