Architecture of Robert and James Adam published in installments between 1773 and 1822 he proclaimed that he had started a revolution in the art of architecture Adam's revolution was expansive it comprised the introduction of avant garde light and elegant architectural decoration mastery in the design of picturesque and scenographic interiors and a revision of Renaissance traditions including the relegation of architectural orders the rejection of most Palladian forms and the embrace of the concept of taste as a foundation of architecture In his own time he became the second architect in European history after Andrea Palladio 1508-80 to be associated with an eponymous style today known as the Adam Style and in the eighteenth century the Adamite mode Adam further distinguished himself as one of the first professional architects in modern Britain within an era that had only recently adopted widespread use of the term architect To elevate his professional status he sharply differentiated between the architect and builder and undertook considerable self promotional efforts With his two pioneering publications Ruins of the Palace of the Emperor Diocletian at Spalatro in Dalmatia of 1764 and his Works he established himself as an erudite scientific antiquarian and as a connoisseur of buildings Moreover the architect cum marketer deftly and innovatively composed his books to address a modern critical reading public especially the emergent architectural connoisseur and made robust arguments for the leading roles of domestic architecture and architectural decoration in shaping British identity Drawing on a wide range of sources this project argues for a more comprehensive vision of the nature of Adam's revolution and new consideration of his significance as an architect writer and public figure It also builds on scholarship that seeks to contextualize Adam as a product of the Enlightenment the Romantic era and a rapidly changing modern Britain
