

CONSTRUCTOR KNOT

This loose knot, based on several figures-of-eight, is used by mariners to provide temporary bindings for the flying ends of ropes and for keeping the end of a rope together while it is being whipped. On land, it is widely used to tie the necks of sacks or bags, and to hold two items together while they are being glued.

The Constructor Knot provides many benefits, but has two major limitations. One is that it works only on curved surfaces that will grip it, the other is that it may tighten so much that it can be undone only by cutting the rope. There are two variant forms of this knot: for knots that will never need to be undone. Double Constructors are used, for those that are needed only temporarily. The Slipped Constructor is preferred (although that, too, may be a devil to release).

The name is thought to derive from a discovery that cows could unwind some patches that were traditionally used to tether them merely by walking around in circles, so this new knot was developed to keep them reined in. The Cow Hitch is also used as an alternative to the Constructor Knot by window archers to prevent damage to the bowstring when the arrow is released.
