

Uranium City THE LAST BOOM TOWN

"They came from anywhere and nowhere into the wild desolation that was the nucleus of a supra-continent. The veteran prospector came – heavy bearded, with face burned brown by a thousand suns, roughened by sand and wind. The novice came – protege of God alone. The drifter came – forsaken of both God and man, searching for a new beginning. All of them lured by the golden promise of an awakening north." Des Fogg, Kiwanis Magazine.

Uranium City started out as a collection of shacks and tents in 1952. In its 30 years of lusty, brawling life it matured into a thriving, close-knit community boasting most of the amenities of towns 800 kilometers to the south. Add to this the advantages of clean air, clean water in pristine lakes and rivers, no traffic jams, very little crime, no juvenile gangs and, aside from the usual problems with alcohol, no drugs.

Ben McIntyre went to Uranium City in 1952 at the age of twenty to teach school for one year. He stayed for 28 years. During that time he met and married wife Hilda, worked at various jobs including a short stint as a prospector and then a mine surveyor before going into the clothing business with his wife. he also tried his hand at radio announcing, newspaper editing and manufacturing cement blocks. The McIntyres are now retired and live on Vancouver Island.
