Supporting Families Lessons From The Field:

Supporting Families Karen McCurdy, Elizabeth D. Jones, 2000-05-03 Whether one talks about the family support movement the early childhood movement or child abuse prevention program planners struggle with defining their target populations and structuring their interventions This volume documents the efforts of the William Penn Foundation and its Child Abuse Prevention Initiative By chronicling the efforts of this unique initiative and its groundbreaking research the authors provide many useful lessons for practitioners funders policymakers and researchers These lessons are particularly useful as child abuse prevention efforts seek to move beyond isolated demonstration efforts and toward a universal system of support for all parents Through the lessons learned from the successes and failures of the foundation this book has many implications for prevention efforts underway across the country and forms a reservoir of knowledge on how to assess child abuse prevention in urban communities

Gielen,2025-10-01 Programmes and interventions to counter violent extremism CVE have become widespread across Europe CVE is a relatively new and very complex phenomenon The term itself has become a contested catch phrase for a broad array of interventions targeting different populations at different stages in the radicalization process The complexity of CVE has resulted in a serious lack of evaluations in the field Those few evaluations that we can draw upon are very heterogeneous both in terms of evaluation method and the type of interventions that they address It is therefore impossible to make any grounded statements on the effectiveness of CVE Academia thus has little theoretical basis for adequately advising the policy and practitioner community on the best course of action We are thus in need of an evaluation method that can accommodate the complexity of CVE while providing an authoritative basis for new evaluations and at the same time exposing incorrect or too limited normative assumptions in CVE policy We also require a meta analysis method for synthesizing the variety of evaluations available to produce generic insights This study applies and further develops realistic evaluation and realist review to provide an evaluation and synthesis method for complex social programmes such as CVE The end result is heuristic development of the realistic evaluation method which provides a basis for future CVE evaluation studies The dissertation also provides insights on relevant contexts and mechanisms in CVE which will help policymakers further develop their CVE programmes Resources in Education ,1998
