

Involving Fathers in the Treatment of Patients with Juvenile Rheumatoid Arthritis

JOAN MORSE

IN OUR culture the management of a child's illness is traditionally the responsibility of the mother. Usually the mother is the first to recognize the signs and symptoms of ill health; she initiates communication with the doctor and carries out medical recommendations. She is the person who customarily accompanies a child to the doctor's office or the clinic and is the most frequent visitor during a child's hospitalization. This characteristic acceptance of responsibility by mothers for seeking help for children led to an initial focus on the mother-child relationship in studies of the psychosomatic aspects of illness in young people being treated at the Robert B. Brigham Hospital.

In early studies of young patients with rheumatoid arthritis the descriptions of the mothers ranged from "masochistic and depressed"¹ to "openly rejecting and hostile."² The results show that although the mothers carried out their obligation to provide care for their children, they nevertheless contributed toward unhealthy attitudes in their offspring or were responsible for stress related to the onset or exacerbation of certain illnesses.

The establishment of the Clinical Center for Juvenile Rheumatoid Arthritis at Robert B. Brigham Hospital in Boston in September

1963 afforded an excellent opportunity to re-examine the interaction of patients with chronic disease and their families.³ J. Sydney Stillman, the Center director, and his associates have long been aware of the effect of environmental and emotional factors on illness and on a patient's ability to function. The Center's staff therefore includes a child psychiatrist and a social worker among the specialists evaluating each patient. Through his knowledge of each patient's family and environment, the social worker attempts to modify aspects of home life that seem detrimental to a patient's progress.⁴

Primary medical responsibility for Center patients is assumed by two internists who specialize in rheumatology and serve as visiting physicians at Robert B. Brigham Hospital, an institution concerned with all aspects of rheumatic disease. In addition, the Center's consultants include an orthopedist, a pediatrician, and an ophthalmologist, as well as the psychiatrist. The paramedical group includes representatives from occupational therapy, physical therapy, and the nursing service, as well as the social worker. The team meets weekly to discuss patient care and the research problems involved in long-term studies of juvenile rheumatoid arthritis. Each member is expected to undertake a full
