John Arden's stone cottage stood in the midst of the hill plateau higher than the streams began shelterless to the four winds While washing dishes Deborah could see through the small age misted pane counties and blue ranges lying beneath the transparent or hazy air in the bright unfading beauty of inviolate nature She would gaze out between the low window frame and the lank geraniums forgetting the half dried china when grey rainstorms raced across from far Cader Idris ignoring in their majestic progress the humble variegated plains of grass and grain breaking like a tide on the unyielding heather and the staunch cottage Beyond the kitchen and attached to the house was the shippen made of weather boarding each plank overlapping the next This was lichen grey like the house stone and wood having become worn as the hill folk themselves browbeaten and mellowed by the tempestuous years yet tenacious defying the storm Sitting in the kitchen on a winter night the Ardens could hear the contented rattle of the two cow chains from the shippen the gentle coughing and stamping of the folded sheep while old Rover lay with one ear pricked and now and then a hill pony strayed from the rest whickered through the howling ferocity of the gale
