Introduction

The role played by the Jesuit Naphta in Thomas Mann's 1924 masterpiece The Magic Mountain is a sign of the great writer's fascination with the Jesuits. Less well known is that this fascination was shared by other major Central-European authors. Mann's near contemporary, the Polish writer Stanisław Brzozowski (b.1878), published Alone among People in the last year of his life, 1911. Here, too, in the person of Giava there is an intriguing image of what it meant to be a Jesuit. These fictional characters, appearing within fifteen years of each other, are strikingly similar. And both these figures are truly fictional, for neither represented the reality of the Jesuit order in the first part of the twentieth century.

Mann and Brzozowski likely both knew and exploited the same popular source, the Monita secreta, first published in Cracow in 1615 by a former Jesuit named Hieronim Zahorowski (1582–1634).¹ It created an influential stereotype that spread across Europe, and stuck, of the Jesuit as a consummate intriguer using all possible means, mostly nefarious ones, to increase the order's sway. Through talented writers such as Mann and Brzozowski an early seventeenth-century slander continued to have currency well into the twentieth century.

There is a better way to appreciate the mentality and way of life of a Central-European Jesuit from the mid-nineteenth century through Mann's lifetime ending in 1955, almost exactly a century later. It involves a careful reading of the many existing documents and publications from that epoch; they indicate what the Jesuits actually did. A good place to start is with a collection published in 2009 thanks to the editorship of Robert Danieluk, S.J., under the auspices of the Jesuit Historical Institute of Rome. The work is entitled *The Jesuit Secret Mission in Podlasie 1878–1904: "Columbae simplicitate et serpenti prudentia."*²

The confrontation of Jesuit source materials with the fictional representations is most instructive. Both Naphta and Giava were presented as Marxists and almost as atheists when in point of fact the actual Jesuits of this epoch were closely aligned with the papal crusade
