down by Robert Moses and Jane Jacobs put simply development versus preservation and have followed New York City models. Now Isenberg turns our attention west to colorful pioneering and contentious San Francisco where unexpectedly fierce battles were waged over iconic private and public projects like Ghirardelli Square, Golden Gateway and the Transamerica Pyramid. When large scale redevelopment came to low rise San Francisco in the 1950s the resulting rivalries and conflicts sparked the proliferation of numerous allied arts fields and their professionals including architectural model makers, real estate publicists, graphic designers, photographers, property managers, builders, sculptors, public interest lawyers, alternative press writers and preservationists. Isenberg explores how these centrally engaged arts professionals brought new ideas to city, regional and national planning and shaped novel projects across urban, suburban and rural borders. San Francisco's rebuilding galvanized far reaching critiques of the inequitable competition for scarce urban land and propelled debates over responsible public land stewardship. Isenberg challenges many truisms of this renewal era especially the presumed male domination of postwar urban design showing how women collaborated in city building long before feminism's impact in the 1970s. An evocative portrait of one of the world's great cities, Designing San Francisco provides a new paradigm for understanding past and present struggles to define the urban future.
