

Pillars of Non-Conformist Faith, Tractotakers Dedicated to getting on, and the people of the tavern, or people of the World. The origin of these bucheddau is seen in the Welsh revivals of the 19th and early 20th century.

It is argued that everyone can be fitted into these two categories, except for a few individuals banished to a footnote on page 61. The British social anthropologist at least will be struck by the absence of reference to class cutting ties. Experience suggests these must exist. References to the special interrelationships of farmers (p. 40) and to the fact that there are more women believers than men (p. 56) seems to confirm their existence across Buchedd boundaries, even in Abergarnrh.

Buchedd's A. identity will also be familiar to students of the Process and ethic, and the contradiction between not being of the world and yet striving to get on is not analyzed. (It is, in fact, dealt with briefly in Trevor Owen's essay on page 233).

Class as a function of income or occupation is confused on pages 13-15. Mr. Jenkins does not do himself or his rich material justice in this essay.

George Jones' essay on Tregarth provides interesting ethnographic information on a small Welsh town of only 600 inhabitants which nevertheless serves as a commercial center for a considerable community. The essay, unlike the first, has no analytical framework. It provides some introduction to the study of the structure of the town, but a complete lack of incident makes it unable to deal with social process. The stage is set but the players never appear and we reach the end still waiting for the drama to begin. Instead we are told that kinship is medieval in origin, and Class Victorian.

The third essay by T. Jones Hughes concerns the village of Aberdaron in Pen Elyn, known to the English as the Llyn Peninsula. Mr. Hughes provides a thorough geographical description somewhat marred for the general reader by unfamiliar Welsh place names and geographical technical terms. By all means refer to Bryci but let the uninformed know that this range of mountains is a so-called Snowdon.

Trevor Owen's essay on Chapel and Community in Glaslyn is in a different category from the second and third essays of the book, and has a much more sophisticated sociological framework of analysis. His treatment of the way in which the growth of chapel religion may have weakened religious practice by separating it from the hearth is particularly interesting, as is his account of the interrelation of home and chapel in the field of light entertainment. One would like to see the comparison between this community and the Habriles expanded and the analysis deepened. Even in this essay, however, the method of presentation (a section of facts, then one on history, finally one on sociology) seems to prevent a real sociological treatment. As in the other essays, no actual events are described in any detail. The book's only unity is that each essay is by a student of Aberystwyth and concerns Wales. To criticize it does not reflect so much on the abilities of the authors as it underlines the necessity for adequate sociological studies to be carried out by trained professional sociologists or anthropologists.

No real ethnography has ever been done of the hill tribe known as Thakurs who live in fairly close contact with more advanced cultures of the plains in the North-Konkan area of Maharashtra State, India. Chapple's book, therefore, is most welcome in filling some gaps in our knowledge about Indian tribal groups. It is indeed unfortunate that the author did not provide any detailed maps of the area, nor discussion so that the
