ABSTRACT

This bibliometric study examines the scholarly landscape of migration and women's health, analyzing 1314 Scopus-indexed articles from 462 journals published between 2000 and 2023. Findings indicate a consistent increase in research output, reflecting growing global interest in this interdisciplinary field. Geographically, high-income countries (HICs), including the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, and Australia, dominate contributions, while low- and middle-income countries (LMICs) remain underrepresented despite hosting significant migrant populations. International collaborations play a crucial role, with key institutions such as the University of California and the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine shaping research efforts. The keyword co-occurrence analysis highlights migration, gender dynamics, mental health, and reproductive health as dominant themes. Persistent gaps in mental and reproductive healthcare access for migrant women emphasize the need for trauma-informed care (TIC), mobile bilingual healthcare services, and inclusive health policies. Disparities in research funding further exacerbate global health inequities, underscoring the necessity of equitable redistribution of resources, including redirecting at least 10 % of HIC research grants to LMIC-led studies. The COVID-19 pandemic magnified pre-existing vulnerabilities, stressing the importance of multilateral collaborations and sustainable policy interventions to enhance migrant healthcare access. This study provides valuable insights into research trends, collaboration networks, and thematic focus areas, offering a foundation for future interdisciplinary research and evidence-based policymaking aimed at promoting health equity for migrant women globally.

1. Introduction

A migrant is a person who relocates from their typical place of residence, domestically or internationally, either temporarily or permanently, and for multiple reasons^a [1]. The increasing scale of global migration, with over 272 million international migrants documented in 2019, among them, nearly half are female migrants, accounting for 48.1 % of the global migrant population [2], has made women's health a critical area of study and policy intervention [3]. A significant proportion of these migrants originate from low- and middle-income countries (World Bank). Migration is often influenced by a complex interplay of economic, social, familial, and political factors, and over the past 50 years, the intersection of women's migration and health has emerged as a significant field of research, reflecting the evolving dynamics of global mobility and gendered health experiences.

Migration is now recognized as a key determinant of health, positioning it as a fundamental issue on the global health agenda [4]. The health impacts of migration can be both positive and negative, depending on migratory conditions, experiences, and health policies in host countries. Within this broader framework, migrant women's health has gained increasing attention due to the unique challenges they face before, during, and after migration [5]. Compared to men, migrant women are more vulnerable to health deterioration, as they often encounter gender-specific challenges, including limited knowledge of contraception and STIs, restricted access to healthcare due to isolation and stigma, and experiences of violence and unintended pregnancies [6,7].

In the context of globalization, urbanization, and demographic shifts, women's migration has become increasingly diverse, encompassing work-related relocation, family reunification, forced displacement, and other mobility patterns (United Nations). These diverse migration trajectories intersect with multiple dimensions of women's health,
