The Pentagon Reporters:

The Pentagon Reporters Robert B. Sims, 2005-01-01 Those who make national security decisions in the United States inevitably meet the press. Hardened though a government civilian or military officer may be toward television or newspapers, he will nonetheless eventually be required to do business with reporters or to decide how best to avoid them. Sometimes good fortune with the press spells victory for a policy or program. Failure in dealings with the media can doom the best efforts of the brightest people. Clearly those who would be successful defense advocates and managers need to know about reporters and the flow of news. This study looks at national security news by examining the small band of reporters who are considered the Pentagon press corps. It introduces those who regularly cover military stories. It presents reporters largely as they see themselves in the context of their working environment. It tells us what they say about their work, their colleagues, their organizations, and their sources. As a result, the study tilts toward being an occasionally sympathetic examination of why reporters do what they do, especially why they do things that often irritate leaders in the Defense Establishment. This approach from the reporter's viewpoint has a purpose. National security decisionmakers sometimes view unrestrained news coverage of military subjects as baggage the democratic system carries; baggage so weighty it may some day sink the ship of state. Some regard reporters as alarmists, as people who are inaccurate, intentionally biased, and opposed to the military. To them, reporters are out to sell newspapers, to be seen on the television tube, to make a name for themselves regardless of the cost to the nation. In certain cases, these critics may be right. It really does not matter. Officials must, barring a change in the Constitution, contend with reporters anyway. They should study journalists carefully, see them as they see themselves, know their capabilities and weaknesses, and develop sensible methods for working with them. It's part of the job. After a brief overview of the historical roots of reporting about national defense, the following pages are organized by media categories. Wire services, the part of the news system that reports developments rapidly to other news organizations, are described first. Then come chapters about the suppliers of the printed word: daily newspapers, news services, weekly news magazines, and technical and policy publications. Television, perhaps the most troublesome of all the media covering the military, is discussed in a chapter on broadcasting. Another chapter considers the international and internal publics, noting the interaction between Pentagon reporters and the Government's overseas and employee information programs. The final section focuses on Pentagon correspondents as a group and includes some general observations for those who want to understand defense news coverage better or to become better communicators themselves.

Professional Journal of the United States Army, 1994 The War Correspondent Greg McLaughlin, 2016-02-20

What is the role of the war reporter today? Through interviews with prominent war and foreign correspondents such as John Pilger, Robert Fisk, Mary Dejevsy, and Alex Thomson, The War Correspondent delves into the most dangerous form of journalism. From Crimea to Vietnam, the Falklands to the Gulf and Afghanistan, Iraq and the War on Terror, the book examines the attractions and risks of war reporting, the challenge of objectivity and impartiality in the war zone, the danger that journalistic independence is compromised by military control, censorship, and public relations, as well as the commercial and technological pressures of an intensely concentrated, competitive news media environment. As history and ideology return to the reporting of international conflict, Greg McLaughlin asks what that will mean for a new generation of war correspondents attuned not to history or ideology but to the politics of the next conflict.

Ugly War, Pretty Package Deborah L. Jaramillo, 2009-09-25. Deborah L. Jaramillo investigates cable news presentation of the Iraq War in relation to high concept filmmaking. High concept films can be reduced to single sentence summaries and feature pre-sold elements; they were considered financially safe projects that would sustain consumer interest beyond their initial theatrical run. Using high concept as a framework for the analysis of the 2003 coverage of the Iraq War, paying close attention to how Fox News and CNN packaged and promoted the U.S. invasion of Iraq, Ugly War, Pretty Package offers a new paradigm for understanding how television news reporting shapes our perceptions of events.
