

The Control of Snail Hosts of Bilharziasis and Fascioliasis in Southern Rhodesia

V. DE V. CLARKE,¹ C. J. SHIFF² & D. M. BLAIR³

The authors review the experimental work that has been done since the Second World War on the use of chemical molluscicides in Southern Rhodesia and describe the development of a co-operative snail control campaign involving local landowners and various Government departments. In 1959 and 1960 efforts were concentrated on four large-scale experiments to test the methods of application of copper sulfate, sodium pentachlorophenate and Bayer 73 under a variety of climatic and physiographic conditions.

From this work the authors conclude that it would appear possible and practicable to control vector snails in natural water courses and reservoirs in savannah areas of Central Africa to a degree at which it is thought that transmission of bilharziasis from man to man and of fascioliasis from animal to animal does not take place.

The use of chemical molluscicides for the control of the snail hosts of bilharziasis and fascioliasis has been accepted for the present as the most promising and practical means of controlling these diseases in Southern Rhodesia.

The first planned programme of snail control in this country was initiated by Alves & Blair.⁴ In the Mazoe Valley to the north of Salisbury, the application of copper sulfate to all water bodies in the upper catchment of the river was undertaken during the dry winter months of 1950 and 1951. May to September, malaria control with residual insecticides being the preoccupation of the field control teams during the hot wet months of the year from October to April. All water bodies in the upper valley, which is 1.2 million acres⁵ in extent, were sprayed with a saturated solution of freshly prepared copper sulfate over the space of two seasons. Although rough surveys indicated an apparent decrease in snail populations, the bilharziasis control programme as a phase in a combined attack on malaria and bilharziasis was abandoned in favour of an intensified malaria control campaign. In subsequent years in this area snail control was limited to repeated sprayings of molluscicide at certain points where the human population had close and repeated contact with water bodies containing numbers of vector snails.

In 1953, an experiment aiming at the total elimination of snails from an isolated river system was attempted in an African reserve in the Mtoko District, 90 miles (145 km) north of Salisbury. The whole river system was given two successive treatments at a six-week interval, copper sulfate being applied to give a final concentration of 20-30 p.p.m. The application was not repeated again but nevertheless it was found that snail reinfestation was slow. Subsequent control schemes were based on the lessons learnt in this experiment.

During the years following the Second World War there was great development in Southern Rhodesia of soil and water conservation measures and a country-wide programme to encourage the building of reservoirs to hold up surface water, and the construction of retaining weirs on rivers, large and small, was initiated. This campaign, of course, increased the number of water bodies which were potential snail habitats and created perennial bodies of surface water in which snails could survive the long dry season from May to September each year. The areas of Southern Rhodesia in European ownership have been divided according to major river
