Spout Spring A Black Community Case Studies In Cultural Anthropology:

Spout Spring Peter H. Kunkel, Sara Sue Kennard, 1971 A case study and ethnography about the Spout Spring neighborhood place names have been changed to preserve anonymity a Black community where residents are stable and relatively secure economically The study is neither interpretive nor strongly theoretical in its orientation One theme that comes to the fore is the conflict between integration and separatism while some young people are attracted to the idea of separate Black institutions most elders are still cautiously committed to the idea of eventual true integration Most of the older community institutions in Spout Spring are accommodationist rather than reformatory and certainly not revolutionary in their orientation Sequoyah the larger community of which Spout Spring is a part is a university town where some of the barriers between Black and white residents are breaking down African Americans have seen some educational integration and improvement in employment opportunities Overall the improvements in race relations between the time of this study 1965 1970 and the pre World War II period are at least mildly encouraging Adapted from Foreword page v
