specific inhibition modalities with respect to efficacy in vivo What information do medicinal chemists and pharmacologists need from their biochemistry and enzymology colleagues to effectively pursue lead optimization Beginning with a discussion of the advantages of enzymes as targets for drug discovery the publication then explores the reaction mechanisms of enzyme catalysis and the types of interactions that can occur between enzymes and inhibitory molecules that lend themselves to therapeutic use Next are discussions of mechanistic issues that must be considered when designing enzyme assays for compound library screening and for lead optimization efforts Finally the publication delves into special forms of inhibition that are commonly encountered in drug discovery efforts but can be easily overlooked or misinterpreted This publication is designed to provide students with a solid foundation in enzymology and its role in drug discovery Medicinal chemists and pharmacologists can refer to individual chapters as specific issues arise during the course of their ongoing drug discovery efforts
