

and is illustrated separately in Figures 9 to 13. Before mounting, the rider's right stirrup leather should be set at approximately the correct length. The length should be well known from previous saddleings; however, it can also be estimated by approximating from the ground by extending the leather just enough to the length of the rider's arm. The left stirrup should initially be set at a similar length during the mounting procedure so as not to cause undue strain on the part of the rider.¹

As soon as the rider has mounted the horse he should immediately adjust his own stirrups to ensure that the horse will remain standing still. The rider should use adjuster to stirrups and position them on the ball of the foot (the

The Mounting Process
