and possible solutions to the current crisis Gordon examines how health care cost cutting and hospital restructuring undermine the working conditions necessary for quality care She shows how the historically troubled workplace relationships between RNs and physicians become even more dysfunctional in modern hospitals In Gordon s view the public image of nurses continues to suffer from negative media stereotyping in medical shows on television and from shoddy press coverage of the important role RNs play in the delivery of health care Gordon also identifies the class and status divisions within the profession that hinder a much needed defense of bedside nursing She explains why some policy panaceas hiring more temporary workers importing RNs from less developed countries fail to address the forces that drive nurses out of their workplaces To promote better care Gordon calls for a broad agenda that includes safer staffing improved scheduling and other policy changes that would give nurses a greater voice at work She explores how doctors and nurses can collaborate more effectively and what medical and nursing education must do to foster such cooperation Finally Gordon outlines ways in which RNs can successfully take their case to the public while campaigning for health care system reform that actually funds necessary nursing care

THE first thing which attracted my attention to the man was the shock of white hair above the lean young face But for this I should not have looked twice at him long spare and stooping a shabby figure he crouched over a cup of coffee in a corner of the dingy restaurant at fretful enmity with the world typical I should have said of the furtive London nondescript But that white hair startled me it gleamed out unnaturally cleanly in those not overclean surroundings and although I had propped my book up against the water bottle at my own table where I sat over my solitary dinner I found my eyes straying from the printed page to the human face which gave the promise of greater interest Before very long he became conscious of my glances and returned them when he thought I was not observing him Inevitably however the moment came when our eyes met We both looked away as though taken in fault but when having finished his coffee and laid out the coppers in payment on his table he rose to make his way out between the tables he let his gaze dwell on me as he passed let it dwell on me quite perceptibly quite definitely with an air of curious speculation a hesitation almost an appeal and I thought he was about to speak but instead of that he crushed his hat an old black wideawake down over his strange white hair and hurrying resolutely on towards the swing doors of the restaurant he passed out and was lost in the London night I was uncomfortably haunted after that evening by a sense of guilt I was quite certain with unjustifiable certainty born of instinct that the man had wanted to speak to me and that the smallest response on my part would have encouraged him to do so Why hadn t I given the response A smile would have sufficed a smile wasn t much to demand by one human being of another I thought it very pitiable that the conventions of our social system should persuade one to withhold so small a thing from a fellow creature who perhaps stood in need of it That smile which I might have given but had withheld became for me a sort of symbol I grew superstitious about it built up around it all kinds of extravagant ideas pictured to myself the splash of a body into the river and then recovering my sense of proportion told myself that one really couldn't go about London smiling at people Yet I didn't get the man's face out of my head It was not only the white hair that had made an impression on my mind but the unhappy eyes the timidly beseeching look The man was lonely I was quite sure of that utterly lonely And I had refused a smile I don't know whether to say with more pride than shame or more shame than pride that I went back to the restaurant a week later I had been kept late at my work and there were few diners but he was there sitting at the same table hunched up as before over a cup of coffee Did the man live on coffee He was thin enough in all conscience rather like a long sallow bird with a snowy crest And he had no occupation no book to read nothing better to do than to bend his long curves over the little table and to stab at the sugar in his coffee with his spoon He glanced up when I came in casually at the small stir I made then by his suddenly startled look I saw that he had recognised me I didn't nod to him but I returned his look so steadily that it amounted to a greeting You know those moments when understanding flickers between people Well that was one of those moments I sat down at a table placing myself so that I should face him and very ostentatiously I took a newspaper out of my pocket unfolded it and began to read But through my reading I was aware of him and I knew that he was aware of me At the same time I couldn't help being touched by what I knew I should read in his face the same hostility towards the world at large and towards myself the same appeal half fearful half beseeching It was as though he said aloud and distinctly Let me talk For God's sake let me talk it out And this time I was determined that he should yes I was quite grim over my determination I was going to get at the secret that lay behind those hunted eyes
