Design and Application of State Observers for Exothermic Fed-batch Reactors with Uncertain Kinetics and Heat Transfer Frédéric Sauvage,2007

Monitoring the limiting reactant concentration is a key question to maximize the productivity and to guarantee the safety of exothermic fed batch processes However in most applications the concentration cannot be measured in real time since suitable devices do not exist or are too expensive the concentrations are then measured by off line analyses In this context monitoring the concentrations via software sensors or state observer based estimators is an attractive option The presence of model uncertainties is a major limitation when applying state observers to real processes More precisely in fed batch exothermic reactors the bad knowledge of both the reaction kinetics and the heat transfer may prevent the use of classical observers In this study we propose two different approaches to estimate the concentration of the limiting reactant in a class of single phase exothermic fed batch reactors with uncertain kinetics and heat transfer The first approach is based on a finite time converging observer that provides an estimate for the reaction rate via the reactor energy balance equation The concentration is then computed from the reaction rate estimate via a material balance equation The main contribution of this approach is the use of a finite time observer to limit the reconstruction error by guaranteeing a small convergence time interval for the reaction rate estimate The second approach is based on an interval observer that provides two bounds for the concentration by considering uncertainties related to both the heat transfer and the reaction kinetics The final estimate is then computed as the mean of the bounds A systematic tuning procedure has been developed for each of both estimation techniques Both estimators have then been tested and validated with real data coming from the production of different kinds of resins carried out in 10 tons reactors
