

The Philippine Challenge: Sustainable and Equitable Development in the 1990s

To be born into the Philippines today is to face a future that is, at best, uncertain. The nation's forests, coral reefs and productive soil are being destroyed at a rate that is among the fastest in the world. For the tens of millions of Filipinos that live off the land and the sea, this means steadily declining yields of rice, corn and fish.

Degrading poverty remains the basic characteristics of most families. Born into poverty, most children are quickly thrown into the workforce, and are denied those most basic of human rights: a decent education and rudimentary health care. Alarming numbers of those who do develop working skills are pushed toward delivering those skills overseas.

Secretary of Trade and Industry Jose Concepcion speaks for the Aquino administration as he decries the poverty and lack of opportunities. In their place, he offers a vision of the Philippines joining the ranks of South Korea, Taiwan and the other "newly industrializing countries" (NICs) by the year 2000. The vision, however, is vague, and concentrates on rapid growth rates in output and exports.

Unfortunately for the majority, growth in the Philippine economy is currently occurring at the terrific expense of the environment, of democracy for and participation by the majority, and of equity. The vision of what Philippines the next generation will inherit needs to be soundly grounded in the principles of ecological sustainability, participatory democracy, and equity.
