THE JUSTIFICATION OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF

This is a very serious and thoroughly honest book,<sup>1</sup> and, as one would expect, written in a style which is highly polished. It is a change to have a book in the field of the Philosophy of Religion which is distinctly positive and constructive whilst not at the same time being dogmatic.

The book falls into three parts. The first part attempts to justify in an admittedly summary fashion two assumptions that are made in the rest of the book—

- (1) that traditional theism cannot be shown to be necessarily false or logically incoherent;
- (2) it cannot be proved or rendered probable in any strict sense.

The second part is the all crucial part; in it Professor Mitchell attempts to indicate the way in which Christian belief may be rationally defended and 'in so doing to give an account of the nature of the disagreement between theists and atheists that might commend itself to both parties' (p. 39). In the third part the author examines the implications of Part II for the problem of the nature of faith and the relation between faith and reason; he suggests that there are important resemblances between religious and non-religious cases.

Apart from two brief comments on Part I, I shall, for reasons of relative importance and space, limit my discussion to Part II. First, then, my two brief comments on Part I.

Professor Mitchell admits that his justifications are summary; I fear the reader will regard his treatment of the problem of Evil (p. 10) too summary—he will raise the questions, 'Why so much suffering?' and 'Why isn't it equally distributed if it is a necessary condition for the development of virtues which will fit us for the Heavenly Kingdom?' Likewise the treatment of the problem of making identifying reference to God is just too summary (pp. 17-18).

To turn to Part II. Mitchell rejects the view that there can be no rational case for or against Christianity on the grounds that those who subscribe to this view assume that for any argument to be rational it must conform to the requirements of strict proof or probability and this he claims is false. There can be arguments correctly judged as rational which do not conform to such
