

Simplest way to generate logs in Java using java.util.logging's SimpleFormatter and XMLFormatter

```
public class CrunchifyLogGenerator {
    public static void main(String[] args) {
```

```
        // A Logger object is used to log messages for a specific system or application
        // component. Loggers are normally named, using a hierarchical dot-separated // namespace. Logger names can be arbitrary strings, but they should normally be // based on the package name or class name of the logged component, such as // java.net or javax.swing. In addition it is possible to create "anonymous"
        // Loggers that are not stored in the Logger namespace.
        Logger crunchifyLogger = Logger.getLogger("crunchifyLog");
```

        // Simple file logging Handler.
        FileHandler crunchifyFileHandler;
```

```
        try {
```

```
            // We are setting handler to true = append data to file
```

            crunchifyFileHandler = new FileHandler("/Users/ashah/crunchify/crunchify-log.log", true);
            crunchifyLogger.addHandler(crunchifyFileHandler);
```

```
            // Print a brief summary of the LogRecord in a human readable format.
```

```
            SimpleFormatter formatter = new SimpleFormatter();
            crunchifyFileHandler.setFormatter(formatter);
```

            // Format a LogRecord into a standard XML format.
