

Two Cheers for Czech Democracy*

SEÁN HANLEY

Abstract

The paper discusses the state of Czech democracy and current research agendas on democracy in the Czech Republic, focusing in particular on the role of political parties. It considers Czech democracy both in relation to Central and Eastern Europe (CEE) and in the light of the evolving relationship between CEE and Western Europe. It suggests that current CEE states such as the Czech Republic gradually approximating to models of West European-style party politics may need rethinking. It then examines democracy in the Czech Republic in relation to debates on democratic “backsliding”, arguing that in the Czech cases the principal “backsliding” risks lie less in the rise of authoritarian populists than a potential crisis of democratic representation driven by perceptions of corruption. The paper concludes with some suggestions about future avenues for research on Czech and CEE democracy.

“So two cheers for Democracy: one because it admits variety and two because it admits criticism. Two cheers are quite enough: there is no occasion to give three.”
E.M. Forster, “What I Believe”

1. Introduction

Some years ago I attended a conference on democracy in Europe and ended up talking to a very prominent specialist on Russian politics. We had an interesting conversation, but at one point in the evening he turned to me and asked in a slightly worried tone if I realized that the Czech Republic didn’t really matter very much. I appreciated the advice – and I understood it: small, slightly peripheral countries are often considered marginal in comparative politics. They lack inherent geo-political importance and, as Barrington Moore (1966: xxiii) argued, their politics tend to be driven by – or copied from – stronger powers beyond their own borders.

* This paper is revised version of a keynote speech given at the 10th Czech Political Science Symposium, Brno, 3 April 2014.
