Benzodiazepines R.G. Priest, U. Vianna Filho, R. Amrein, M. Skreta, 2012-12-06 U Vianna Filho In his historical evolution man has been able to dominate nature by means of his technological achievements his knowledge and his inventiveness attaining an increasing control over the world and its organization As a result his power over his fellow men has also increased giving him more and more responsibility which leads of necessity to one existential problem is the contemporary man with all his power and knowledge really happy Technological progress has brought him several rights and desires health better insight into the future and greater control over his own destiny but despite all this he still suffers from insecurity and from all the new problems that he has to face which fact accounts for his imperfections and limitations that inevitably generate anxiety Anxiety therefore constitutes one of the main characteristics of modern man It can be foreseen today that in the near future the entire population of any large city will suffer from anxiety and behave in a neurotic way Man is seeking relief from pain suffering and naturally also anxiety Thus all possible efforts are being made to find a solution for this anxiety The search for substances that are able to eliminate anxiety is one of the constant concerns of modern science and in this context one of the turning points as we will see in this volume has been the discovery of the chemical agents known as the benzodiazepines
