hypothesis Significant differences in movements and respirations were found for certain groups of individuals These differences also varied in relation to the whales behavioral activity feeding feeding traveling and traveling The shore based photography was used to obtain additional information on individuals especially mother calf pairs and their sightings as well as to evaluate the success of this approach A total of 144 individuals including 10 females sighted with calves and 31 calves were identified during 2004 2009 The shore based photo identification approach was successful and due to being a non invasive technique is recommended as a supplemental approach to vessel based photo ID efforts Reproductive success and survival of western gray whales are concern especially due to the presence of industrial activity in the area as well as recently increased mortalities of female gray whales off Japan Therefore the results of this study indicate the importance of considering differences in needs and habitat utilization of different groups of individuals for basic science information as well as for management purposes of protection of western gray whales
