Background and Objectives Auditory training involves active listening to auditory stimuli, and it has garnered attention in recent years because it enhances speech-in-noise recognition and the satisfaction of hearing aids. The purpose of this study was to determine the efficacy of a closed-set auditory training protocol for adult hearing aid users. We also evaluated the retention effect of training at a 1-month follow-up test after the completion of training.

Subjects and Method Twenty-two hearing-impaired listeners who have used bilateral hearing aids for more than two months participated in this study. Out of 22 participants, 12 participants (training group, TG) received an 8-week auditory training while 10 participants did not receive any training (non-training group, NTG). For training, three types of closed-set training materials (environmental sounds, words, and sentences) were used. The training was conducted eight times over eight weeks (one session per week, about one hour per session). The difficulty level was adjusted by controlling the number of closed-set choices and the signal-to-noise ratios. To determine the efficacy of training, open-set speech recognition abilities and subjective hearing aid satisfaction were evaluated.

Results All the open-set speech recognition performances of the TG were enhanced after the closed-set auditory training, while the performance of the NTG was not significantly changed. The auditory training had a positive impact on the TG individuals' subjective satisfaction of hearing aids. The improvement from training was maintained over one month after the completion of the auditory training.

Conclusion The closed-set auditory training protocol might lead to enhanced speech understanding as well as more satisfaction with hearing aids for adult hearing aid users.
