

Deck joists overlap
each other a minimum of 3 in.

The diagram illustrates the construction of a wooden deck's substructure. It shows several wooden joists running diagonally across the frame. These joists are supported by a horizontal beam. The joists are connected to the beam using toenails, which are driven into the side of the joist at an angle. Additionally, the joists overlap each other, and the overlapping section is secured with a metal plate. Lateral blocking, which are vertical wooden pieces placed between the joists, is used to keep them plumb. Arrows point from the text labels to the specific construction details: the overlap, the toenailing, the lateral blocking, and the metal plate.
