

of the various towns are also of interest, having pendant flags attached to the upper part of each, one being slightly ornamented. With these were found finger-rings, consisting of a flat mill of brass, beads of clay in various shapes, and a variety of smaller articles for personal decoration, showing some considerable amount of refinement in the masses. The inhabitants of Middlesex and Kent appear, however, to have been always in possession of the Thames of the inland position, which may be ascribed to their connection with the commercial traders, and their respective wealth. The contents of their vessels indicate a higher refinement, and a different taste in decoration. Antiquaries are now beginning to classify the Thames below

House of Commons's House.

in England with much certainty, by the data afforded by these relics from their last resting-places.

Such were the people-possessions of a race destined to establish the laws and customs of Anglo-Saxons over the whole world. In their resting-places to their names, we find much that is worthy of study in their life on the banks of the Thames. "In the old times before us," scattered among their graves are instructive illustrations of their history not to be found in the pages of the chronicles, but worthy of notice, and in our descent of the stream we shall get hints to note the relics of these barons, which also testify to their history as clearly as do the more enduring monuments of stone to the histories of classic nations.

Before we pass under the bridge at Walton, we are called upon to leave the boat, and walk a brief distance to visit the village and the church. Both are full of interest. In the village is the house of the President Bradburn; at Ashley Park, not far distant, the Princess is said to have some time resided; at Epsom, in the vicinity, Lord William Roke, the astrologer,—

"A warning note, might whisper,
That death is destiny's busy whisper,
And super-natural of the unseen order."

and his residence lies in Worcester Green. On St. George's Hill is an ancient monument of considerable size, which, although of date anterior to the St. George's Church.

Romans, was, as we have intimated, probably occupied by Caesar when preparing for his struggle with the Britons, under Camulodunon, and it may be safely conjectured that his legions passed from this height into the valley to cross the Thames at Chertsey Meadows—"on sublimis arvis impetu." From the summit of this hill is obtained one of the most striking and magnificent views to be found anywhere in England, extending not only over Middlesex and Surrey, but into Buckinghamshire, Northampton, Essex, Kent, and even Sussex.
