First Nations Health and Wellbeing - The Lowitja Journal is the official journal of the Lowitja Institute, Australia's first community-controlled research institute. This important new journal aims to uphold First Nations rights to sovereignty and self-determination within research practice. It is a community-controlled, international, inter- and multi-disciplinary peer-reviewed online open access journal that is dedicated to expanding access to First Nations research.

We focus on primary research papers, systematic reviews, and informed short reports and community contributions on all aspects of the science, culture, philosophy and practice regarding health and wellbeing for First Nations communities.

We recognise that structured knowledge systems of First Nations Peoples, developed over millennia to underpin thriving and healthy communities, offer solutions to the survival and flourishing of our people. All papers must include substantive contributions by First Nations authors and will be peer reviewed by experts in the field of the submitted work.

The journal is guided by the National Health Leadership Forum but governed by the Lowitja Board. While we are based in Australia, our Editorial Board is international and we welcome papers from First Nations researchers from all over the world, reflecting our global perspective and reach.

We invite you to submit your next research article to this important new journal. Please visit our website for more information.
