CANADIAN IDENTITY: A FRANCOPHONE PERSPECTIVE

It would be imprudent to define Canadian national character as a collection of objective traits, as André Siegfried once attempted to do. National character or national identity is better understood in terms of the discourse of those concerned. How can we distinguish Canadians from Americans? How were the English Canadians of a former era distinguished from their French-Canadian contemporaries? How can we distinguish today's Canadian identity from Québécois identity if not by the images they have of themselves and by the distance they put between themselves and others?

National identity is above all a construct. In an uncompleted 1920 monograph on the nation, the well-known French sociologist Marcel Mauss expressed this idea well when he wrote that a "nation believes in its language." While at first glance the reader will no doubt be struck by the word language, it is actually the word believe that appears crucial here. With this word, Mauss indicates that identity is constituted first and foremost as a belief. He adds, "All the citizens who make up the nation participate in the idea that drives it." The idea that drives it: again, it is in the imagination, manifesting itself in works that reflect human thought, that identity is created.

Identities are formed through discourse. But what kind of discourse are we talking about? And how does a national identity come to be identified? Fernand Dumont has cast new light on these questions by identifying the processes through which a national reference is constructed. Dumont defines the nation as "a grouping by reference: people are brought together in a nation through common symbolism and ideological discourse. Historians, poets, and many others contribute to this symbolism and discourse, and hence to developing and confirming the reference." People share something in common, a symbolism of reference expressed in works of the collectivity such as literature, ideology, and historical writing. This shared symbolism is the basis for a sense of belonging that transcends divisions of class, religion, region, age, or sex, and that takes the form of national sentiment, which is not the same thing as nationalism. Consequently, there is a radical difference between Siegfried, whose approach to the definition of identity involves a view of society as an objective reality,
