

The Syndrome of Nonverbal Learning Disabilities Description and Associated Features

Description and Characteristics of the Syndrome of Nonverbal Learning Disabilities Rourke and colleagues have also identified two subtypes of SLD based on their distinct patterns of neuropsychological strengths and weaknesses, in addition to subtyping learning disabilities into academic deficit areas (Rourke, 1982, 1985, 1993, 1999; Children with basic phonological processing disorder (BPPD) and those with nonverbal learning disabilities (NLD) make up the subgroups (Rourke, Hayman-Abello, & Collins, 2003). Dyslexic children with BPPD are unable to spell or decode single words, but their math performance is adequate. Children with NLD, on the other hand, exhibit the opposite pattern: normal to excellent decoding skills, but poor arithmetic performance. According to Collins & Rourke (2003), children with NLD lack "tactile and visual perception, complex psychomotor skills, and in dealing with novelty" while those with BPPD lack phonological processing. When Mattson, Sheer, and Fletcher (1992) compared activity in the left and right hemispheres of children with BPPD and NLD, they discovered that while children with BPPD showed less activity in the left hemisphere while performing verbal tasks, children with NLD showed less activity in the right hemisphere when performing nonverbal tasks.

The educational system, which typically adheres to the more conventional definition of learning disabilities as language-based disorders, has had difficulty establishing legitimacy for the NLD subtype (Thompson, 1997). The profile of NLD is the opposite of that of the more conventional type of SLD, with Verbal IQ frequently being significantly higher than Performance
