ABSTRACT

A synoptic review of plant disease epidemics and outbreaks was made using two complementary approaches. The first approach involved reviewing scientific literature published in 2021, in which quantitative data related to new plant disease epidemics or outbreaks were obtained via surveys or similar methodologies. The second approach involved retrieving new records added in 2021 to the CABI Distribution Database, which contains over a million global geographic records of organisms from over 50,000 species. The literature review retrieved 186 articles, describing studies in 62 categories (pathogen species/species complexes) across >40 host species on 6 continents. Pathogen species with >5 articles were: Bursaphelenchus xylophilus, Candidatus Liberibacter asiaticus, cassava mosaic viruses, citrus tristeza virus, Erwinia amylovora, Fusarium spp. complexes, Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. cubense, Magnaporthe oryzae, maize lethal necrosis co-infecting viruses, Meloidogyne spp. complexes, Pseudomonas syringae pvs, Puccinia striiformis f. sp. tritici, Xylella fastidiosa, and Zymoseptoria tritici. Automated searches of the CABI Distribution Database identified 617 distribution records new in 2021 of 283 plant pathogens. A further manual review of these records confirmed 15 pathogens reported in new locations: apple hammerhead viroid, apple rubbery wood viruses, Aphelenchoides besseyi, Biscogniauxia mediterranea, Ca. Liberibacter asiaticus, citrus tristeza virus, Colletotrichum siamense, cucurbit chlorotic yellows virus, Erwinia rhapontici, Erysiphe corylacearum, Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. cubense Tropical Race 4, Globodera rostochiensis, Nothophoma quercina, potato spindle tuber viroid, and tomato brown rugose fruit virus. Of these, 4 pathogens had at least 25% of all records reported in 2021. We assessed two of these pathogens – tomato brown rugose fruit virus and cucurbit chlorotic yellows virus – to be actively emerging in/spreading to new locations. Although three important pathogens – Ca. Liberibacter asiaticus, citrus tristeza virus and Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. cubense – were represented in the results of both our literature review and our interrogation of the CABI Distribution Database, in general our dual approaches revealed distinct sets of plant disease outbreaks and new records, with little overlap.

INTRODUCTION

Plant diseases pose a continuing threat to food security, plant health, and ecosystem health globally (Jeger et al. 2021; Ristaino et al. 2021; Rizzo et al. 2021). Historically, plant disease epidemics and outbreaks have been associated with increased interconnectedness of the landscape, climate change, human movement, and increased intensification of crop production practices such as irrigation. Plant pathogens are responsible for an estimated 20-40% of crop losses, although net effects are hard to quantify due to a lack of evidence related to precise distribution and impact (Savary et al. 2019, 2022). Even so, even less is known about the prevalence of pathogens of minor crops, of those of regional importance only, of non-food crops or concerning the provision of ecosystem services from native wild plant populations and communities (Gougherty and Davies 2021, Jeger 2021). It is reasonable to assume that epidemics or major disease outbreaks in major crops are at least somewhat well documented, but what is often missing is comprehensive information on the extent and frequency of new outbreaks across all plant pathosystems. Here we test a potential approach to fill that knowledge gap by exploring approaches to retrieve information related to new plant outbreaks and epidemics from literature and database searches.
