Circadian rhythm is a biological process that governs the timing of various physiological and behavioral functions. It is a 24-hour cycle that repeats itself every day. The circadian rhythm is controlled by a group of genes and proteins in the brain, and it is influenced by external factors such as light and darkness. The circadian rhythm is important for many aspects of health, including sleep, metabolism, and immune function. Disruptions of the circadian rhythm can lead to various health problems, including insomnia, depression, and obesity.
