Climate-Driven Crop Yield and Yield Variability and Climate Change Impacts on the U.S. Great Plains Agricultural Production

Meetpal S. Kukal &amp; Suat Irmak

Climate variability and trends affect global crop yields and are characterized as highly dependent on location, crop type, and irrigation. U.S. Great Plains, due to its significance in national food production, evident climate variability, and extensive irrigation is an ideal region of investigation for climate impacts on food production. This paper evaluates climate impacts on maize, sorghum, and soybean yields and effect of irrigation for individual counties in this region by employing extensive crop yield and climate datasets from 1968–2013. Variability in crop yields was a quarter of the regional average yields, with a quarter of this variability explained by climate variability, and temperature and precipitation explained these in singularity or combination at different locations. Observed temperature trend was beneficial for maize yields, but detrimental for sorghum and soybean yields, whereas observed precipitation trend was beneficial for all three crops. Irrigated yields demonstrated increased robustness and an effective mitigation strategy against climate impacts than their non-irrigated counterparts by a considerable fraction. The information, data, and maps provided can serve as an assessment guide for planners, managers, and policy- and decision makers to prioritize agricultural resilience efforts and resource allocation or re-allocation in the regions that exhibit risk from climate variability.

The global drivers of agricultural production and their variability include technology, genetics, climate, soil, field management practices and associated decisions such as fertilizer applications, tillage and crop hybrid selection, irrigation management, row spacing, planting date and depth, population density, etc. A significant portion of the advances in agricultural production is a result of technological advances in genetics, agronomic and resource use practices<sup>1–3</sup>. For example, the sharp yield improvements in the cereal grain yields in the U.S. Great Plains region (Fig. 1) are attributed to the development and adoption of such technologies<sup>4</sup> and management practices such as earlier planting dates that allow adoption of longer-maturity crop hybrids<sup>5</sup> that generally yield greater than short-season hybrids.

Amongst these factors, weather and climate are prominent drivers or influencers of agricultural production systems and it has been shown that recent trends in change of climate variables may be responsible for substantially affecting crop yield trends despite advances in technology and other fronts. The Fifth Assessment Report<sup>6</sup> stated that the last century experienced an increase of 0.74 °C globally in air temperatures due to increased greenhouse gas emission concentrations and the period of 1983–2012 was the warmest 30-year span over the last 800 years for the Northern Hemisphere. Also, it reports evidence of increasing precipitation, especially in mid latitudes of the Northern Hemisphere with medium confidence since 1901, but high confidence after 1951. These changes have had considerable and spatially variable effects on crop production at the global scale<sup>7–14</sup>, resulting in significant yield and economic losses as well as associated challenges in terms of meeting the feed, fiber, and food production of growing human population. On the contrary, there are studies<sup>15</sup> that have shown that negative trends in growing season air temperatures from 1982 to 1998 that caused up to 20% yield increase in maize and soybean yields.

The aforementioned contrasting natures and magnitudes of the impacts of the climate trends are anticipated, owing to the large scale agro-climatic variations (climatological growing period length, growing degree days, rainfall patterns, and prevalence of different crop varieties) that occur in different regions. The complexity of these

Matthews, C.A.B. International, International Rice Research Institute, 1995 Although recent rapid industrialization has contributed greatly to improved living standards it has also resulted in an increase in concentration of greenhouse gases leading to global warming The relationship between climatic change and agriculture is particularly important as world food production is under pressure from a growing population Rice is the second most important crop in the world after wheat with more than 90% currently grown in Asia where it is the main item of the diet It has been estimated that rice production needs to increase by 70% over the coming decades to meet the demands of population growth Hence it is vital to understand the effect of climate change on rice growth development and production This book is the outcome of a collaborative study between the United States Environmental Protection Agency s EPA Environmental Research Laboratory and the International Rice Research Institute It quantifies the impact of climate change on rice production using crop simulation models and integrates existing knowledge of the effects of increased levels of carbon dioxide and temperature Detailed scenarios are provided for selected major rice producing countries in Asia Japan India Malaysia South Korea China and the Philippines The book represents a major addition to the literature      Impacts of Climatic Change and Variability on the Great Plains Canadian Climate Centre, Canada. Canadian Agriculture in the 21st Century Dr. Marvin S. Anderson, The Canadian Farming Community is facing numerous ongoing challenges including rapidly changing technologies the gradual erosion of the rural lifestyle growing consumer concerns about the healthiness of food and growing environmental concerns including climate change This book begins with an historic overview of agriculture in Canada followed by a statistical profile of the contemporary Canadian farm ranch supporting agri industrial complex and the innumerable farm organizations in Canada The vital role of international trade and government support in the evolution of Canadian agriculture is also highlighted Resource management issues and related hot button issues e.g climate change GMO's are also addressed in considerable detail In addition Dr Anderson identifies the likely trends in Canadian agriculture in the immediate years ahead Emphasizing the diversity complexity strength and vitality of the agricultural sector Canadian Agriculture in the 21st Century ultimately highlights how it effectively molds and remains integral to the socioeconomic fabric of both rural and urban Canada An underlying theme is the importance of having Canadian agriculture become increasingly ecofriendly in the challenging years ahead particularly the need to gradually adopt more sustainable regenerative organic technologies and the need to more pro actively serve as a vital CO2 sink in climate change mitigation Dr Anderson also suggests that the public should financially compensate farmers ranchers for protecting environmental amenities that accrue to everyone A complimentary theme is the need for Canadian agriculture to become increasingly sensitive to consumer concerns particularly with respect to rigorous health standards animal welfare and sustainable resource management
