

ART AS EXPERIENCE: JOHN DEWEY

The central claim of John Dewey's (1859–1952) theory of art is that art should not be conceived as a radically distinct aspect of human life. Too many theories of art fail, he insists, just because they treat art as a fundamentally different kind of human endeavor. Although admittedly endowing certain features of these endeavors with a special prominence, art must nonetheless be seen as continuous with more prosaic forms of human activity. Thus, the very features often cited as those that distinguish art from other spheres of human life—such as form and rhythm—are, according to Dewey, found throughout our ordinary experience. Dewey's view of art thus puts him at odds with such diverse theorists as Kant (Chapter 4), Bell (Chapter 10), and Collingwood (Chapter 11).

But if art is continuous with the rest of what we do, according to Dewey, wherein lies its distinctiveness? Dewey's answer is that art results when the desire to create an object whose perceptible properties will yield immediate satisfaction controls the process of its production. Although we may be pleased with the products of many different kinds of activities, only art making is guided by the aim of producing just such pleasure.

An important feature of this definition is that it unites various aspects of art often treated as distinct. For example, both artist and audience play equally important roles in this definition. An art object must be produced by an artist in anticipation of the satisfaction her audience will receive. Similarly, the artistic and the aesthetic refer, for Dewey, to two aspects of the same process, which he sometimes calls "aesthetic artistic" to indicate that neither of the two terms is primary. For him, "artistic" refers to the physical object, whereas "aesthetic" refers to the way in which it is experienced. Art, to be art, must be both artistic and aesthetic, have both an objective and a subjective side. There is, for Dewey, no art that is not aesthetic.

But what "aesthetic" means for Dewey is not what it often means for other theorists of art, for he holds that any experience can have an aesthetic dimension—as is, for example, the satisfaction a mathematician experiences in constructing a proof or a cobbler does in finishing a shoe. It is this sense of conscious completion that Dewey refers to as the aesthetic component of experience and that he sees as attainable in all realms of human endeavor. What is
