

The Significance of the Job Training Partnership Act for Federal-State-Local Relationships

Gail Garfield Schwartz and Kenneth E. Poole

INTRODUCTION

The Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) changed federal-local relationships created by federal assistance for manpower training under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) to federal-state and state-local relationships. Whereas under CETA, local prime sponsors were funded directly by the federal government, under JTPA, funds go to the states, which are responsible for allocating them, setting up and overseeing the administrative structure, and setting the performance goals that fund recipients must meet.

This switch created a sudden opportunity and, also, a sudden danger. The opportunity was to achieve a new means of control, to coordinate manpower training with related activities, and to channel manpower training efforts where they were most needed or where they might have the highest payoff. The danger was that, given inexperience, the states could not meet their responsibilities. This danger was compounded by the prospect that federal funding would diminish over time and that failure to meet goals would be a state failure, not a local or federal one.

This paper speculates on how JTPA might change state-local relationships and how the new program is likely to influence outcomes that would have positive or negative repercussions in the states. It is based on information from disparate sources, including public interest groups, individuals in charge of JTPA at the state and local levels, and interviews with researchers who are beginning to assess JTPA systematically--and conjecture.
