

THE LETTERS OF
STEPHEN GARDINER

Edited by
JAMES ARTHUR MULLER

As secretary to Cardinal Wolsey, counsellor of Henry VIII, chief minister of that monarch for the last six years of his reign, and Lord Chancellor under Queen Mary, Gardiner had a hand in practically every diplomatic and political manoeuvre of his time, and was the friend—or enemy—of every person of prominence. All this is reflected in his letters. He was likewise bishop of one of the most important of English dioceses and leader of conservative churchmen. His letters form a running comment from the conservative or Catholic point of view on the Henrician and Edwardine reformations. They also express the opinion of one who was admitted on all hands to be the ablest English jurist of his day, on such constitutional matters as the relation of the royal supremacy and of the royal power in general to parliamentary enactment and the Common Law; they illustrate the activities and ideas of a University Chancellor who was at once humanist, legislator, and theologian; they abound in vivid comment on notable contemporaries, and in illuminating allusions to customs of the day; and they reveal a many-sided personality which attacked life vigorously, steadily, and not without humour. Moreover, since many of them were written informally and rapidly, and sent without revision, they afford admirable examples of colloquial English as used by a man of culture in the second quarter of the sixteenth century.
