

IMPRESSION MANAGEMENT (SOCIOLOGY)

DEFINITION

Impression management in sociology refers to the conscious or subconscious process individuals use to control and manipulate how others perceive them. It involves tailoring one's behavior, communication, or appearance in social interactions to project a certain image or to fit into societal norms and expectations.

ERVING GOFFMAN

Erving Goffman's dramaturgical approach is the most famous impression management theory in sociology. Goffman argues that individuals are metaphorical performers managing the impressions they present to others. Essentially, individuals curate their performances (public behavior) to convey a desired image to their audience (society).
