

August

Tonight the street is quiet in the blue, early evening air.
The boy on his bike pedals down the sidewalk and living-things too tell us the neighborhood.
He pedals hard and thinks how he has turned four, wondering if the lightning bug swirling on his left hand will stay there as he reaches the circle, past the orange fire plug, and back toward his mother's curious face.

The clouds at the end of the street move slowly like animals he can't quite name.
The bug lifts its wings, testing the air, its feet dancing in place, talking.
Tonight she will read the book again about the boy who runs away, who finds friends who need him, and who returns to his family at the end of the day bearing red bread, cookies, a puppy, and new shoes.
He pedals over the cracks, contrasting the dark clouds, desires the sweeping drapes nearby by the vacant lot.
Night is turning the neighborhood blue-grey, luminous.
The firefly lets out its green light, opens its wings above his head and is gone.

She stands with a horse in her hand, spraying the bushes by the house, glancing back at him.
He crosses the street now as the motions for him to go slowly, to look both ways.
When his bike falls in the wet grass, she says, Alone, cupping her hand over his palm,

*Keep him safe from the wind and the heat the tiny first shadow from her hand to his.
The sky knows what it's going to do, let mountains.
She carries him inside, separates to his room.
His face rests in her neck and he smells a crushed flower, sweet and tangy, in her skin.
Arms, steps, carnivals of clouds follow past him on the street.*

When thunder rumbles outside his window, there is another boy he watches moving down a street to collect worn red bread, new shoes and a runaway puppy. He has heard the firefly will disappear and the measure of her voice telling him about the boy in a motion like a bike bounding over sidewalk cracks or falling to rest in wet grass, catching the last blue light of summer before it lifts over his head and is gone.
