

The Portrait of the Christian Pedagogue in Religious Literature and Patristic Philosophy

Ion Albulescu, Mirela Albulescu

ABSTRACT: Christianity has provided humans an ideal and a conception of life, synthesized in principles able to serve as stable benchmarks for moral and intellectual training efforts. The purpose of Christian education was to help the believer to take care of his soul, to reach the superior perfection, which would allow him the access to "The Kingdom of Heaven", which allows us to conclude that we already are in front of a new type of pedagogy. The Fathers of the Christian Church have fulfilled, through the transmitted teachings and by personal example, for the most of believers, a teaching mission. Their activity marked the beginning of an educational model oriented towards acquiring basic elements of Christian dogma, forming ideas about the world according to this dogma, nurturing a certain attitude towards life. Its content was marked by strong ethical load, as the man fallen in the matter sin must be prepared for a happy future life. Therefore, the meaning of education is to facilitate the acquisition of virtue, as a guarantee of the fulfillment of such an objective. The patristic literature and philosophy promoted Christian values: prayer, virtue, charity and the love of the close ones, but also universal human cultural values. For the transmission of these elements a dedicated pedagogue was needed, whose profile was in clearly outlined in the writings of the Holy Fathers. We tried to capture in this study, the main qualities of a Christian educator, like these have been presented in the writings of the early centuries.

KEYWORDS: Christian pedagogy, education, patristic philosophy, pedagogical attitude.

I. INTRODUCTION

The Parents of the Christian Church have approached in their religious and philosophical writings their current religious themes, establishing principles and drawing a coherent way of achieving both the education of children and young people as well as of adults. Among the topics covered there is also the profile of the educator, which has always been discussed up until today. The importance of good education and therefore of a good educator has always been highlighted and, apart from rare cases, has been recognized by everyone.

References to the qualities of a good educator are still in Plato's Republic or in Quintilian's Institutio Oratoria, as a result of the belief that such qualities are a guarantee of the proper training of children and young people. Such preoccupations are also encountered by the Holy Fathers of the Church, who have often argued that the teacher must have certain qualities in order to achieve his work correctly and with good results and succeed in his noble mission.

The ideas of the Fathers of the Church and of the classical authors who influenced them, including Plato and Quintilianus, were transmitted throughout the Middle Ages, influencing those with concerns about education. We can invoke, for illustration, the Dominican Petrus, who in the thirteenth century demanded from the educator, under the influence of Augustine and the Antiquity, to be a talented and inventive spirit, to lead a moral life, to accompany science with modesty, to prove eloquence, experience and practical dexterity in teaching children. As promoters of the Christian ideal of education, the Holy Fathers left to the posterity authentic pedagogical role models.

II. THE EXEMPLARY ROLE MODEL

Christianity was not limited to the cultural, liturgical dimension, but it developed a true theological doctrine, based on the teachings preached by the Greatest Teacher: From the beginning, Christianity manifested itself as a religion-teaching, and consequently the preoccupation to shape an ideal teacher profile was inevitable. The role model was Jesus Christ, commonly called the Master, the appellant that the Himself instituted: "You call Me Master and Lord, and well you say because that I am" (Matthew 23: 8-10). By concrete and symbolic parables and deeds, Christ pursued the shaping of the believer's personality.
