Accounting for the Economics of the Firm Michael Dietrich, 2010 A primary aim of this paper is the presentation of a survey of possible inter connections between management accounting and the economics of the firm The guiding philosophy is that both accounting and economics can be illuminated and developed by exploring the interface between the two disciplines The paper sets out different economic perspectives on the firm and examines implications for the role and functioning of management accounting systems in each case The different perspectives are classified in terms of the ways in which they incorporate organisational authority and organisational information use The resulting classification of firm types reveals different roles for management accounting But the discussion does not suggest that one of these taxonomic categories is necessarily superior to the others and by implication one role for management accounting being superior Instead the approach taken here is that each approach embodies particular assumptions or a particular world view that defines the characteristic questions that are asked and the answers suggested By implication management accounting systems have equivalent multiple meanings that are potentially all relevant for any single organisation
