

of the FLA was voluntary, and not the result simply of subordination to the Soviet government. Second, it will be argued that the breakdown in Albanian-Yugoslav relations in 1948 partly explains the enduring attraction of the ideology. Finally, it will be argued that Albania's national language reformers, in any case, favoured the adoption of the Stalinist development strategy.

The history of the communist movement in Albania is not well documented. The official history of the Party of Labour of Albania¹ gives 1928 as the year in which cells were first set up in Albania, while Marmulluke² suggests that it was 1927. By 1940 there were three government communist groups in the country: the Karga, the Shkronja, and the 'Youth' group. The formation of these groups and the struggles between them need not be discussed here.³ Suffice it to note that Albania's first link with the Soviet Union was provided by the formation of an Albanian Communist Group in Moscow in 1927. An important member of this group, Ali Kelmendi, returned to Albania in 1933 as the Communist's representative and is reported to have exerted a strong influence on the organization and ideological direction of the Karga group, from whom came the future leaders of the FLA, with the exception.

On the other hand, it cannot be assumed that the Karga group was no longer a subsidiary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, for at that time under the influence of communists who had embraced Marxism in Western Europe, its share of the impact he has had on the development of Albanian economic ideology and the goals of the FLA. It may prove fruitful to provide a brief biography of the most important of these men, Enver Hoxha.

Hoxha was born on 16 October 1908 in Gjirokastra, of middle-class Muslim parents. He completed his Albanian education at the Lyder Frangolli in Korce and was awarded a government scholarship to study engineering at Montpellier in France. He soon joined the Communist Party of France, and, as a consequence, lost his scholarship. In 1934 he moved to Paris, where he wrote several articles for L'Humanite attacking Jug's subversion to the Italian government, and began to study Law. Hoxha's activities and his links with other Albanian communists in Paris, were eventually discovered by the Albanian government and he was forced to move to Belgium. In Brussels he continued to read law but, for reasons that are not known, did not complete his studies.

Hoxha returned to Albania in 1936 and joined the Karga Communist Group. Although he was not a leader of the group, his popularity among Albanian communists, which probably resulted from an acute desire not to become involved in the power struggles of
