Social Innovations For Development:

Social Innovations for Development C. G. Hedén, A. S. King, 2016-07-29 Social Innovations for Development focuses on the need for the advancement of social innovations relative to the progress of science and technology. The selection is composed of works of authors who have conducted research on the need to enhance social innovations and cope with the advancement of science and technology, particularly how these areas affect institutions, social and government structures, and humankind as a whole. The book stresses world trends that require institutional change and the need to institute innovation in the structures and procedures of government. The text also offers a discussion on the history of social change. Along with this discussion are remarks and suggestions on how to transform social innovations from theory to action. As the world develops, the need to put up social inventions to facilitate the adoption of technical inventions is stressed. With this pointed out, the work of the International Foundation for Social Innovation is highlighted. In the research to establish the connection between technological and social innovation, the role of international prizes is of great value. Thus, specific areas for awards and incentives are discussed. The book is a vital source of information for those interested in establishing the relationship of social innovations with the advancement of science and technology. Strategies and Best Practices in Social Innovation

Marta Peris-Ortiz, Jaime Alonso Gómez, Patricia Marquez, 2018-05-31 This book examines the different ways companies can develop and design social innovation. Combining technological and social perspectives, the contributors present emerging research on social innovation from different sectors such as entrepreneurship, education, and energy. Collectively, the authors demonstrate the ways in which social innovation can drive sustainability and development in regions around the world. All societies are characterized by their political, economic, and social institutions, as well as by how they utilize technology. The social innovations with the highest importance are those which modify existing institutions or create new ones, and based on their magnitude, they can be considered as radical or incremental. For example, when Joseph Chamberlain encouraged workers to organize in order to achieve universal male suffrage in Great Britain in 1885, this was considered a radical innovation for British society, which in turn changed its political framework. Social innovations may be based on intelligence and commitment on technology or on social entrepreneurship in its most open forms. In addition, social innovations can be classified into those which correspond to an entire country or region, a field (e.g., education) or a sector (e.g., entrepreneurship, technology, social reform). Featuring contributions on topics such as agro-food, smart cities, higher education, gender equality, and sports, this book is ideal for academics, students, scholars, professionals, and policy makers in the areas of innovation, entrepreneurship, sustainability, and regional development. Social Innovation and Territorial Development Diana

MacCallum, 2009 This volume presents a broad-ranging and insightful exploration of social innovation and how it can affect life, society, and economy, especially within local communities. It addresses key questions about the nature of social innovation as a process and a strategy and explores what opportunities may exist or may be generated for social innovation to nourish

What to Make of Social Innovation? Towards a Framework for Policy Development Carlo Borzaga, Riccardo Bodini, 2012 Over the past few years there has been a growing interest on the part of the scientific community and more recently of policy makers in the concept of social innovation The notion of social innovation is particularly appealing in light of the difficulties facing traditional welfare systems and more broadly a development model essentially based on only two actors the market and the state that is finding it increasingly difficult to meet the growing and diversified needs of society However the uses and definitions of the concept are so disparate that it is becoming increasingly difficult to assess whether social innovation is in fact a helpful construct or just another fad that will soon be forgotten This paper focuses in particular on the usefulness of the concept of social innovation for the purposes of policy development Therefore the goal is not to find the true definition of social innovation Rather it is to search for a useful framework on which to build sound policies that could tackle the complex social issues that have caused scholars and practitioners to pay attention to social innovation in the first place Building on a review of the literature and in particular on a paper by Eduardo Pol and Simon Ville we propose an approach that recognizes a degree of overlap between social innovation and business innovation and argue that social innovation policy should focus on the subset of social innovation that does not overlap with business innovation This is due to the fact that social innovations that overlap with business innovations tend to be profitable and as such the market is amply equipped to supply them perhaps with the support of existing business innovation policies Pure social innovations on the other hand are not driven by a profit motive and thus need either to be subsidized or to be developed by enterprise types that are not motivated by profit maximization Indeed by focusing on the characteristics of different enterprise types we find that not for profit enterprises with an explicit social mission are ideally suited to develop pure social innovation even in the absence of public sector intervention The paper then concludes that targeted policies should be more mindful of the role of different types of enterprise in generating social innovation and more broadly that the debate on social innovation should be more closely aligned with the debate on the pluralism of enterprise forms
