The Social Body

During the medieval period, society distinguished its people according to their function. Thus, one could be a part of the clergy, a noble, or a worker. Each group had its privileges and duties. At first, the higher titles were hereditary. However, with time, money became more powerful than inheritance. Some individuals agreed to sell noble titles to commoners to gain more wealth. Rich and powerful merchants and judges were allowed to become parts of noble families, while female commoners were given an opportunity to marry into nobility (Wiesner-Hanks 282). Thus, the race to the top began among lower-level people. Having a title meant receiving various opportunities, freeing oneself from taxation, and gaining some actual power over others. While some bought their titles, others tried to earn them by serving in courts.

Over time, the percentage of hereditary nobility lessened more and more, while the classes mixed. This intermixture prompted many people to separate themselves from others. Social classes dressed according to their position, noblemen started to build houses that allowed them to have some privacy from servants and family members. Thus, many tried to honor their status and made it so that refusing to conform to one's class distinction was seen as a sign of rebellion.

The Writing Body

Personal documents became one of the sources of information not just for historians but for people of that period as well. After becoming literate, many people wanted to share their knowledge, thoughts, or details of daily life with each other through letters and diaries. Many of them were published publicly. One of the documents that give much information about people's daily activities is Samuel Pepys's diary, in which he recorded his everyday life and political events. As can be seen in the diary's entries, Pepys tried to write down every detail, documenting his dinners, travels, and work (Wiesner-Hanks 291). It is interesting that these everyday activities give one
