3.2. Comparison Criteria of Green Infrastructure

Five authors have made the comparison. In order to guide development and respond to changes, GI has been introduced to provide more informed and systematic way of considering priorities in the spatial planning process, and environmental friendly techniques which can be modified to fit into design situations (Davies and Reddie, 2006). Perke (2008) identifies green infrastructure as one way to conserve natural systems and areas within urban communities.

According to American Society of Landscape Architects (ASLA), green infrastructure has two scales: national or regional level; and urban level. The national or regional level refers to interconnected networks of park systems and wildlife corridors; and the urban level refers to parks and urban forestry, but also to green roofs, walls, and other techniques to reduce energy consumption and storm water runoff. Five contexts and functions of GI [14]:

- (a) Sustainable resource management in land and water resources;
- (b) Biodiversity relating to the importance of connectivity of habitats at a variety of landscape scales;
- (c) Recreation relating to greenways and the use of non-car routes to address public health and quality of life issues; and
- (d) Landscape resources examined from aesthetic, experiential and functional points of view; and Regional development and promotion of overall environmental quality and quality of life.

Benedict and McMahon (2002) summarized seven principles for successful GI initiatives:

Principle 1: To plan and protect interconnected green space systems, successful initiatives can be used as the framework by sharing similar strategies.

Principle 2: Design and plan GI before development. Restoration of natural systems is far more expensive than protecting and preserving existing landscapes. It is essential to identify and protect critical ecological sites and linkages in advance.
