Introduction:

A significant transformation of the post cold war global economy has occurred. There is pressing need to integrate the politics of international relations with the current wave of globalisation to which the third world is part of.

Profound changes underlie this current phase of globalisation. Since the sixteenth century, the primacy of the nation-state has been the organizing principle of the international political order. The nation-state has largely displaced such pre-modern forms of political organization as city-states, tribes, and empires, while simultaneously the market has become the primary means of organizing economic relations, displacing other means of exchange; reciprocity, redistribution, and imperial command economies. These two opposed forms of social organization, the modern state and the market, have evolved together through recent centuries, and their mutual interaction have become increasingly crucial to the character and dynamics of international relations in this twenty first century era of globalisation to which the third world as mentioned earlier is a player.

Changes in the world economy as a result of the globalisation process have indeed elevated politico-social and economic issues as they affect relations among actors in the international system to the highest level of international relations.

This study, then proceeds on two levels. At one level, it is a practical inquiry into the reality of the contemporary international relations and how relations interactions among actors is transforming international; relations in the twenty first century. At another level, this work is theoretical; it attempts to integrate the principal ways in which scholars have conceived of globalisation and international relations. An attempt will be made, throughout the discussion that follows, to draw out implications of the duo as they affect the third world in the contemporary global economy.

Globalisation: Towards A Conceptual Clarification.

Globalisation has become the biggest buzz word in contemporary academic discourse and the popularity of the term is not accidental. It is a broad process permeating the whole world, with far reaching impacts covering economic, political and cultural dimensions of contemporary life.

Globalisation is derived from the word 'global', which refers to things affecting the world (Oxford Dictionary, 2000:503). Globalisation heralds the emergence of a global cultural system. A global culture that is, more or less a kaleidoscope of trans-national socio-cultural characterisation. This includes the existence of global consumption pattern; the existence of a world
