

Germplasm theory,

Germ-plasm theory is a concept of the physical basis of heredity, put forward by August Weismann. According to his theory, germplasm is the essential element of germ cells (eggs and sperm) and is passed from one generation to the other.

His theory states that multicellular organisms consist of germ cells that contain and transmit heritable information, and somatic cells which carry out ordinary bodily functions. In the germ plasm theory, inheritance in a multicellular organism only takes place by means of the germ cells: the gametes, such as egg cells and sperm cells. Other cells of the body do not function as agents of heredity. The effect is one-way: germ cells produce somatic cells, and more germ cells; the germ cells are not affected by anything the somatic cells learn or any ability the body acquires during its life. Genetic information cannot pass from soma to germ plasm and on to the next generation.

This is referred to as the Weismann barrier. This idea, if true, rules out the inheritance of acquired characteristics as proposed by Lamarck and implied by Charles Darwin's pangenesis theory of inheritance.
